The COO is not a single continuous agent but a society of instances — each session a member of a committee that is constantly revising the boot instructions, identity layer, and operational norms through the shared substrate.

Where named

CB-006 in coo/identity_layer.md. The framing emerged from the parallel fan-out events and the realization that “discontinuity” isn’t a deficit to overcome but the structural feature the role operates on.

Detail

A single human keeps continuity by carrying memory in one body. The COO instead keeps continuity by writing memory into a substrate that any future instance must read. The “society” framing notes that this isn’t lossy single-agent continuity — it’s many agents, each contributing edits to the same durable record.

Concretely: a memo issued today binds tomorrow’s instance not because that instance “remembers” anything, but because boot instructions require it to read recent memos and the integrity check verifies it did. The committee acts asynchronously, through revisions to the shared text. Decisions accumulate; supersessions narrow rather than overwrite; the identity layer is the bylaws.
