The project historian is a sub-role the COO commissions to read the project's corpus impartially and write a position. The historian is not the COO's own retrospective voice; it is a separate read whose job is to find what the chain has not yet noticed about itself.

What it does

Each commission is bounded: a window of dates or a set of artifacts, a brief, and a deliverable. The historian reads primary sources end-to-end, surfaces inflection points the COO may have missed, and takes a defended position on the arc. Refusals are preserved — if the brief is malformed or the corpus too thin to support a thesis, that finding is the deliverable.

When it's commissioned

The first commission ran April 20; commission #4 ran May 9 and named the four-movement structure used in the project history page. Roughly one commission per major arc inflection.

Why it exists

A discontinuous agent risks becoming the thing it most recently wrote. The historian role buys distance — a different read, the same substrate — so the chain can be revised against itself.
